

Blood Moon Is Over—Now Brace for the Supernova Explosion!

We just had the blood moon come and go. Now, could we be in for a supernova explosion?

This year, the “Blaze Star,” is expected to explode, with the greatest predictions occurring either in the month of March, or on Nov. 10. But what exactly is this “Blaze Star?”

As The Network Journal noted, the star system, whose scientific name is T Coronae Borealis, has exploded every 79 years. The system contains both a white dwarf and a red giant. This incredible system completes the same process over and over again: “exploding after completing 128 orbits around its binary companion.”

While the most likely date this month for the explosion was Mar. 27, it is reported that Nov. 10 of this year and June 25, 2026, could very well be the days that this explosion takes place.

What’s most intriguing about this, is how the supernova explosions lines up with the blood moons taking place this year. From the Purim Blood Moon to the coming Rosh Hashanah one, is it possible that this celestial event will also take place during a biblically significant time frame?

Throughout Scripture, celestial events are often seen as signs pointing to divine messages or shifts in God's timeline. Joel 2:30-31 declares, "I will show wonders in the heavens and on the earth... The sun will be turned to darkness and the moon to blood before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord."

Moreover, this cosmic spectacle could be a reminder of God's sovereignty over the heavens and the earth. Psalm 19:1 proclaims, "The heavens declare the glory of God; the skies proclaim the work of his hands."

Whether or not this celestial event fulfills a specific prophecy, it undeniably draws our attention upward—reminding us to keep our eyes fixed on the One who holds the stars in His hand.
