

Blue Wild Pigs Spark Concern: Is Nature Sounding an Alarm?

The increase of pestilences in nature continues to grow in resounding ways.

According to Science Alert, game hunters in California recently discovered something no one could ever imagine: wild pigs with bright, neon blue insides.

Dan Burton, who owns a wildlife control business, told The Los Angeles Times that there were not “a little blue,” but “neon blue, blueberry blue.

Local investigations concluded that this happened to the pigs through rodenticide poisoning, though this type of poison has been restricted in the state of California since last year.

California Department of Fish and Wildlife pesticides investigations coordinator Ryan Barbour noted that ““Hunters should be aware that the meat of game animals, such as wild pig, deer, bear, and geese, might be contaminated...” and that “Rodenticide exposure can be a concern for non-target wildlife.”

The appearance of wild pigs with neon blue insides is a stark reminder of the unusual phenomena increasingly being observed in nature, and it resonates with biblical accounts of the end times. Scripture speaks of pestilences, strange occurrences and disturbances in the natural order as signs preceding the return of Christ.
