Perry Stone Protege: Jewel City Revival Becomes the Apple of God's Eye

In the midst of a cold winter in southern West Virginia, a cry of revival burst forth from the state's second largest city, Huntington.

Once known for its railway systems and city lights shining off the waters of the Ohio River in the late 1800s, Huntington earned the moniker "Jewel City" from its prosperous railroads and shipping exports. Today, the home of Marshall University is nearly overrun with addiction and poverty.

The city has been in decline for decades. Nonetheless, a group of believers gathered at the city's largest church, Christ Temple, have been preparing themselves for what they believed to be a soon coming outpouring of the Holy Spirit to the dying city. On Jan. 23, 2022, that is exactly what the city received.

Social Media Giant Gains New Majority Stockholder

Tesla and SpaceX creator Elon Musk has acquired a new title: Twitter's largest shareholder.

News of the entrepreneur's financial grab comes just days after he took to Twitter to question the Left-leaning platform's approach to free speech, even asking if he needed to create a new social media site himself.

Several Right-leaning Twitter users urged Musk, 50, to buy Twitter. It appears he took their prompting to heart.

End-Times Expert: Why All of the Doomsday Preppers Were Right

For years, there was a great debate about what the future of our society would look like. The irrational optimists kept assuring us that we would never suffer any serious consequences for decades of incredibly foolish decisions, and they kept promising that a new golden age of peace and prosperity for humanity was just around the corner.

Meanwhile, others were warning that humanity would soon be plunging into an abyss filled with endless nightmares. Instead of a utopian new chapter in our history, we were warned that war, hunger, pestilence and relentless economic problems were on the horizon.

Prior to 2020, to a lot of people it seemed like the irrational optimists might be right after all. {eoa}
