

CNN Sparks Outrage with Documentary Blasting Christianity

Radical left-wing media outlet CNN decided to make it clear what side it is on by producing a documentary targeting Christianity in America.

CNN's Pamela Brown recently announced her latest project: looking at what CNN considers to be the deadly threat of Christian nationalism.

"For the past several months, I've been working on a special project examining the growing influence of Christian nationalism in America," Brown states.

She then defines Christian nationalism as "an ideology rooted in the belief that our country was founded as a Christian nation, and that our laws and institutions should reflect Christian values."

This "ideology," as she puts it, is simply the truth. America was founded and dedicated to this special purpose. In a preview of the upcoming documentary, Brown shared her concerns about the rise of Christian patriotism since the assassination of Charlie Kirk.

"Charlie Kirk, a conservative activist and prominent Christian nationalist, was assassinated. It became a rallying call for those who believed in his message," Brown said. "And it was a call to action."

One of Brown's guests for the special said that Kirk's memorial service was a marker of the culture shift that the nation is currently experiencing, “where a large segment of American Christians are being activated by these radicalist ideas that say they are the persecuted ones, that they need to stand up for Christians’ rights.”

If Christianity is now being framed as a “threat” simply because believers affirm that America was founded on biblical principles, then we are witnessing more than a media narrative—we are witnessing a spiritual turning point. Christianity is not a fringe ideology; it is the heart and soul of this nation.

From the Declaration of Independence’s acknowledgment of our Creator to the countless revivals that shaped our moral conscience, faith in Jesus Christ has been woven into the very fabric of American identity.

To dismiss that foundation as dangerous is to ignore history itself—and to attempt to sever the nation from the source of its moral compass.

Around the world, Christians are imprisoned, silenced and even killed for their faith. The seeds of that same hostility are beginning to surface here—not through prison bars yet, but through public ridicule, cultural marginalization and the reframing of biblical conviction as extremism.

History shows that freedoms are rarely lost overnight; they erode when people grow silent. If believers do not stand with clarity and courage for their right to worship, speak and live out their faith, those liberties can slip away.

Now is not the time for retreat, but for resolve—because a nation that forgets God does not become freer, it becomes stuck in chains.
