

Gay Politician Threatens to Out Adulterous Congressmen for Blocking Same-Sex Marriage

Alabama's first openly gay lawmaker says she will "out" elected officials if they try to block the same-sex marriage ruling.

State Rep. Patricia Todd, D-Birmingham, says that if the state's politicians are protesting gay marriage based on "family values," she will show exactly how family-friendly they are.

"I will not stand by and allow legislators to talk about 'family values' when they have affairs, and I know of many who are and have. I will call our elected officials who want to hide in the closet OUT," Todd reportedly posted on Facebook.

Todd's comments came after high-profile politicians said they would be fighting a judge's ruling striking down a ban against same-sex marriage.

"Don't start throwing bricks at my window when yours is already cracked as well," Todd tells .

Todd was particularly offended with Speaker of the House Mike Hubbard, who made this comment following the judge's ruling: "It is outrageous when a single, unelected and unaccountable federal judge can overturn the will of millions of Alabamians who stand in firm support of the Sanctity of Marriage Amendment. The Legislature will encourage a vigorous appeals process, and we will continue defending the Christian conservative values that make Alabama a special place to live."