"I want to wish the Jewish people in America and Israel, and all around the world, a very happy Passover," Trump says. "Every year at this time, Jewish families celebrate God's liberation of the ancient Israelites from slavery in Egypt, guiding them through the prophet Moses on a 40-year journey to a very, very promised land."

The president made mention of how the story of Exodus is about the resilience of the Jewish people, and also the power of holding onto faith in God regardless of what we face.

"The story of Exodus, which is retold around the globe and all over the world at every Passover Seder, is a reminder not only of the enduring strength of the Jewish people, but of the importance of putting our faith in Almighty God no matter what the circumstance," he continues.

"To all the Jewish families gathering with friends and loved ones this week, have a blessed Passover, and may God continue to watch over the Jewish people, the state of Israel and the United States of America."

Just as Scripture promises to bless those who bless Israel, Trump's words are a reminder of the importance of supporting the Jewish people, acknowledging the vital role they play in history and in the modern world.

This message contrasts sharply with the approach of the previous White House administration, which often appeared lukewarm or even antagonistic toward Israel and its people. Trump's unwavering support for Israel, particularly in recognizing its significance and honoring its people during key observances like Passover, showcases a deep commitment to strengthening ties between the U.S. and Israel.

His stance underscores the importance of standing with Israel, a crucial ally, and blessing the Jewish people, as this is not only a moral imperative but also a strategic one ensuring lasting peace and prosperity.
