

‘I’m a Pregnant Man’: Magazine Cover Shows ‘Biological Impossibility’

The latest edition of the British version of the popular fashion magazine Glamour features on its cover a picture of a pregnant woman identifying as a man.

Logan Brown, the model, was once lesbian but now identifies as “queer” or a “trans pregnant man.”

“We’re real living people,” Brown said, according to Fox News. “And at the end of the day, I am a trans pregnant man and I do exist. No matter what anyone says, I am literally living proof.”

The cover model—who admitted to having dealt with “really bad mental health” as a child—described coming out as homosexual before exploring an “identity of being trans,” and ultimately settling on identifying as “queer.”

Additionally, Brown is writing a children’s book, “My Daddy’s Belly: The Miracle of Male Birth.”

Brown, who described the pregnancy as “accidental,” as it occurred during a lapse in testosterone treatments for health reasons, said, “To bring a baby into the world in a queer relationship is the best feeling ever.”

The author said the pregnancy initially felt like a drain of all the “manlihood” the 27-year-old had “worked hard for, for so long.”

“How do you tell your partner, ‘Oh, I’m pregnant, but, oh, I’m also your boyfriend as well,’” recalled Brown, before coming to a place of acceptance: “I’m a pregnant man, and we’re very lucky, and I’m proud to do what we’re doing.”

The magazine cover has garnered quite a bit of criticism.

Wendell Husebo, a writer for Breitbart, called the feature story “an example of the West’s rapid decline.”

British commentator Piers Morgan asked, “Logan’s a biological female who got pregnant, as hundreds of millions of biological females do each year... why are you presenting this as a man getting pregnant which is biologically impossible?”
