

Is This the Next 'The Chosen'? 'House of David' Blows Past Competition to Take Top Spot

Could "House of David" be the next biblical series to share the gospel with a widespread audience?

After seeing the success of "The Chosen" over the past few years and the continued emergence of more faith-based films and series productions, Christian filmmaking appears to be the hot trend right now. As this good news continues to grow, the new Amazon Prime show, "House of David" just took the top spot as the number one show on the streaming platform.

Pastor Greg Laurie, who has seen this project come to life through and through, took to X where he praised the success of "House of David." He also pointed out how its success is contrary to the failure of Disney's colossal mistake with their Snow White remake.

Great news!

"House of David" is now #1 on the Amazon streaming platform!

This is more than just a number—it's proof that people are hungry for entertainment that's not only high-quality but also deeply inspirational.

Compare that to the recent disaster of Disney's woke Snow White remake, which cost over $200 million to produce and bombed at the box office. It's clear: the world is ready for something better. I thank God for filmmakers like Jon Erwin, Dallas Jenkins, Jon Gunn, Andy Erwin, and others who are leading the charge in a new wave of storytelling—one that honors God and speaks to the soul.

The remarkable success of “House of David” is a powerful reminder that God is moving in the realm of media and entertainment. As hearts grow weary from the empty narratives of culture, faith-based stories that uplift and point to eternal truths are resonating more than ever. Like “The Chosen” before it, “House of David” isn’t just another show—it’s a signpost to a deeper hunger for righteousness, hope and biblical truth in our generation.
