

Kansas Abortion Clinic Shut Down

Kansas may not be completely free of abortion clinics, but the battle is raging for God's will there.

A new Kansas abortion law will close one of the state's three remaining abortion facilities and is likely to force a second to discontinue providing surgical abortions. The Aid for Women clinic in Kansas City was denied a license by the state health department last week.

However, Planned Parenthood of Kansas and Mid-Missouri President Peter Brownlie are optimistic following a 20-hour inspection of the organization's Overland Park location. "The findings of the inspection indicate we will be in full compliance with the abortion facility license regulations when they go into effect on July 1," Brownlie told the Associated Press. "Thus, I believe we should be granted a license."

Personhood Kansas weighed in on the developments. "The legislature has passed every abortion regulation imaginable. No baby is safe from the grasp of the abortionists until the personhood of every human being is affirmed by law," explains Committee Chairman Bruce Garren.

Meanwhile, Mila Means, a family practitioner who has been training to perform abortions, revealed plans last week to form a non-profit for the purposes of raising a million dollars and opening a new abortion facility in Wichita.

"The requirements are not discouraging," she says. "There are so many redundancies that are not important for the woman's safety that are built into this bill specifically to deny access, and that really makes me angry. That probably reinforced my decision to keep working in this direction.”

Similarly, a law enacted last year in Nebraska that restricts abortion after 20 weeks forced notorious abortionist, Leroy Carhart, to leave the state for the less restrictive laws of Maryland. The move prompted Planned Parenthood to announce their intentions to open six new locations throughout the state.

“Laws that regulate abortion may temporarily disable the abortion industry, but they do not end it. Anyone with the resources to do so can and will continue to kill children in our state,” continues Garren. “The people of Kansas deserve to have their voices heard, and we renew our call to recognize the God-given and inalienable rights of the preborn.”
