

Massive Golden Trump Statue Appears at Trump Doral Ahead of Cadillac Championship

A massive golden statue of President Donald Trump turned heads this week at Trump National Doral Miami as players, fans and media arrived for the Cadillac Championship.

The towering 15-foot display appeared outside the famed “Blue Monster” course as the PGA Tour returned to Trump Doral for the first time in roughly a decade. The eye-catching statue quickly sparked debate online and across the golf world, with supporters praising it as patriotic and critics calling it excessive.

According to Golf Digest, the statue was not commissioned by Trump himself. The project was reportedly funded by Patriot Token, a cryptocurrency group seeking to draw attention to its digital investment platform.

Photos and videos of the statue spread rapidly across X, where reactions ranged from amusement to admiration. The display’s bright gold appearance and larger-than-life scale made it impossible for tournament attendees to miss.

The spectacle also reignited discussion surrounding the intersection of politics, celebrity culture and sports in America. Trump’s golf properties have long served as gathering places for both political allies and high-profile sporting events, and the return of professional golf to Doral has generated significant attention.

The image raises a deeper conversation that extends far beyond politics or sports. Scripture contains numerous examples of gold being used in ways that honored God. The Ark of the Covenant, the golden lampstand and many elements of Solomon's Temple were crafted according to God's command.

At the same time, the Bible repeatedly warns against elevating images, leaders or symbols into objects of reverence. From the Golden Calf in Exodus to King Nebuchadnezzar's towering golden image in Daniel, Scripture draws a clear distinction between honoring craftsmanship and crossing into idolatry.

So biblically, gold itself is not condemned. God even commanded the use of gold in sacred spaces. The problem arises when an image becomes an idol, a political symbol demanding reverence or a substitute for worship that belongs to God alone.
