Our First October Surprise! The East Coast Port Strike Could Throw US Supply Chains Into a State of Chaos

If there is something that you really need to buy, you might want to get it now, because it might not be available later. The International Longshoremen's Association port workers are on the verge of initiating a strike which would shut down ports all over the East Coast and the Gulf Coast, and if that strike lasts long enough it will throw U.S. supply chains into a state of complete and utter chaos. Needless to say, this could have a huge impact on the upcoming election. If store shelves are quite bare in early November, millions of Americans will be in a very bad mood when they go to vote.

If it happens, the strike will begin on Tuesday. This is the first time that we have seen a strike of this nature in nearly 50 years.

Thousands of longshoremen at ports from New England to Texas are set to strike early Tuesday in the first walkout of its kind in almost half a century, freezing commercial shipping on a massive scale and disrupting the national economy weeks before the presidential election.

"We don't need to be moved by the natural things that we're seeing happening right now because the things that's happening in America sort of disguises itself as a political war or a cultural war...but this is a spiritual war," Wheaton says.
