Top Archbishop Abandons Church Doctrine for the World's

Justin Welby, the archbishop of Canterbury, is facing intense scrutiny after he publicly parted ways with the doctrine of the Anglican Church and the teachings of Scripture on sexuality.

Welby, 68, recently appeared on "The Rest is Politics," a podcast hosted by Alastair Campbell and Rory Stewart. During the show, the archbishop said, "All sexual activity should be within a committed relationship ... whether it's straight or gay.

"We're not giving up on the idea sex is within marriage or civil partnership or whether marriage is civil or religious and that, therefore, we've put forward a proposal that where people have been through a civil partnership or a same-sex marriage ... they should be able to come along to a church and have a service of prayer and blessing for them in their lives together."

Truth About Halloween: Warnings From Former Occultists

In separate interviews with Charisma Media, former witch turned deliverance minister Jenny Weaver and former Satanist John Ramirez, who is now an evangelist for Christ, share their powerful testimonies of transformation and deliverance.

"As a young girl, I got into some really deep dark things," Weaver recounts, explaining how an abusive family life led her to seek acceptance in all the wrong places. "The spirit of rejection gripped my life... I began to cut myself, wanting to kill myself, doing a lot of self-mutilation."

Weaver describes how her search for belonging led her to witchcraft after watching "The Craft," a film about witches. "I thought, 'I want to do that,' and I did. I began to dive into Wicca and witchcraft." Her journey takes a dark turn as she becomes immersed in spells and rituals, thinking they would grant her power. "We wanted spirits to come into us... we didn't think it was possession; we thought it was power," she recalls.
