

Muslims Protesting Against Christian Governor in Egypt

Egypt's cabinet asked the interior minister to "confront acts that violate the law" in the southern province of Qena, where protesters, some blocking a railway line, are demanding the resignation of a Christian governor.

In a faxed statement, the cabinet said it can't stay "silent" about events that "undermine public security" and obstruct public services.

Blocking the railroad is "unacceptable" and the government will "take all measures" to end the protests, which cost the country 1 million Egyptian pounds (about $168,000) in losses a day, the state-run Middle East News Agency said, citing Ahmed El Simman, media counselor to the prime minister.

In the latest sign of sectarian tensions, demonstrations have been staged in Qena since last week against the recent appointment of a Christian, Emad Mikhail, as governor.

Read the rest of this story in Bloomberg.