

Mysterious Death Intensifies After Scientist's Final Texts Reveal Fear for Her Life

New attention is being drawn to the death of Amy Eskridge after disturbing details about her final communications surfaced.

According to a report from the Daily Mail, the Huntsville-based researcher—known for her work in advanced propulsion and unconventional aerospace concepts—left behind a series of troubling text messages before her death in June 2022. Authorities ruled her death a suicide by gunshot, but the contents of those messages are now raising renewed questions.

The texts reportedly reveal that Eskridge expressed fear for her safety, at one point warning that if anything happened, claiming that she took her own life, it was not true.

Messages That Raise Concern

The report emphasizes that Eskridge's final texts were not casual or routine. Instead, they suggested a level of urgency and distress. In those communications, she reportedly indicated concerns about what might happen to her.

According to Franc Millburn, who is a retired intelligence officer and British paratrooper, he received messages from Eskridge in May of 2022, which said, "If you see any report that I killed myself, I most definitely did not. If you see any report that I overdosed, I most definitely did not. If you see any report that I killed anyone else, I most definitely did not."

He also said he talked to her hours before her death, where she said, “Everything’s fine, Franc, I’m feeling okay.” He also claims she sent him and others communication stating, “If anything happens to or an wasn’t, it’s suspicious, treat it as such.”

Videos have also surfaced of Eskridge, with red hands, claiming she was targeted by a type of energy beam while typing at her computer.

A Call for Discernment in Uncertain Times

Moments like this demand both wisdom and restraint. While the unknown can easily give rise to speculation, Scripture calls believers to walk in discernment, not fear. Why Eskridge or other scientists have gone missing or died in recent years remains to be seen.

The Bible reminds us that “the Lord brings to light what is hidden in darkness” (1 Cor. 4:5). Even when earthly investigations leave questions unanswered, God sees fully and clearly.

In times of uncertainty, Scripture calls believers to fix their eyes not on the unknown but on the unchanging nature of God. His truth stands firm, even when the world’s mysteries do not.
