

New Fears of Iran-Israel Clash as Tehran Ramps Up Missiles

Israel and Iran are reportedly preparing for another war, although some analysts say it may not happen immediately. At the same time, the situation in Gaza appears frozen, with little progress on the ceasefire agreement and rising tensions in other Palestinian areas of the West Bank.

Iran publicly displayed its ballistic missiles and drones for the first time since the June war with Israel. A report in the New York Times stated it is “only a matter of time” until the next Israel-Iran confrontation.

Ali Vaez, Iran Project Director at the International Crisis Group, told the New York Times that Iranian officials say their missile factories are operating around the clock because they hope to launch 2,000 missiles at once “to overwhelm Israeli defenses, rather than 500 over 12 days” as they did in June.

Vaez said both sides believe another conflict is inevitable, and that Iran is “doubling down on preparedness... to produce a new equilibrium that will wipe out the sense of Iranian weakness.”

Experts also say it is unclear whether Iran’s highly enriched uranium stockpile survived the war. Iran claims it is buried under rubble, but Israel believes the stockpile, which is large enough to build 11 nuclear weapons, has been whisked away to safekeeping.

This as talk that Gaza might remain divided at the yellow line, with one part controlled by Israel and another controlled by Hamas, after President Trump's ceasefire agreement appears to have stalled.

According to the Times of Israel, six European officials say the next phase of the plan is on hold and that reconstruction would take place only in the Israeli-controlled area, potentially leaving the territory split for years.
