The site catalogs active litigation targeting executive actions on immigration, diversity programs, energy regulations, and other federal directives. Legal filings are detailed with case numbers, jurisdictions, plaintiffs, and current status. Organizers say the resource shows how the left uses the courts to derail elected policy.

Key lawsuits include challenges to Trump's order ending federal DEI programs and the new policy restricting birthright citizenship for children of illegal immigrants. The tracker also highlights legal efforts against DOJ actions targeting law firms accused of undermining national policy through litigation.

The group behind the site accuses liberal coalitions of abusing the judiciary to override the will of voters. Legal experts warn this flood of lawsuits threatens the balance of power and serves as a political weapon against conservative governance.

Critics say the lawsuits represent lawful checks on executive power. However, the site frames them as part of a broader effort to entangle Trump's administration in endless legal battles and stall his reforms.
