

NOM Pledges $2 Million to Reverse NY Gay Marriage Law

Gay marriage may be legal in New York today, but the National Organization for Marriage isn't ready to bless the homosexual unions. In fact, NOM President Brian Brown just promised to spend at least $2 million during the 2012 elections to make sure Republicans get this message loud and clear: Voting for gay marriage has consequences.

"The Republican party has torn up its contract with the voters who trusted them in order to facilitate Andrew Cuomo's bid to be president of the U.S." Brown says. "Selling out your principles to get elected is wrong. Selling out your principles to get the other guy elected is just plain dumb."

Few God-fearing Christians would disagree that gay marriage has widespread consequences. As Brown sees it, politicians who campaign one way on marriage—and then vote the other—need to understand that betraying and misleading voters won't be tolerated. Brown has vowed not to continue to fight to protect marriage in New York, just like NOM is doing in New Hampshire and Iowa.

NOM's pledge to commit at least $2 million in the 2012 elections to hold politicians accountable for their vote includes independent expenditures as well as through NOM PAC New York.

"The New York Republican Party is dysfunctional. When Democrats control a chamber, they refuse to permit the people to vote for marriage. When they are a minority, as in Wisconsin and Indiana, they even flee the state to prevent a vote on a bill their base disapproves," notes NOM Chariman Maggie Gallagher. "Contrast that with the behavior of the Republican Party today.

"The Republican Party in New York is responsible for passing gay marriage, and sadly it's the families of New York who will pay the worst price of the new government-backed redefinition of marriage."
