

Pope Leo's Stance Against Scripture: Is This a Sign the End Is Coming?

Pope Leo continues to stir up controversy everywhere he goes.

At the end of November, Pope Leo traveled to Turkey to visit the Blue Mosque. As News Nation put it, one of the primary purposes of this trip was to encourage "Christian unity and interfaith dialogue." The Pope also went to celebrate the "1,700th anniversary of the First Council of Nicaea."

During this visit, the Pope went into the Blue Mosque where he took off his shoes, but did not pray with the imam at the mosque. However, this interfaith visit isn't the only recent act by Leo that is somewhat controversial.

According to Newsweek, Leo has also given his stance on Israel and Palestine, calling for a two-state solution.

"We know that in this moment, Israel doesn't accept this solution, but we see it as the only one that can offer a solution to the conflict that they are living in," the pope reportedly said. "We are also friends with Israel, and we try with both sides to be a mediating voice that can help bring them closer to a solution with justice for all."

To the outside world, Leo's statements may seem rooted in fairness for all, but they are really the abandonment of biblical principles. There really is no such thing as "interfaith." There is only one way to heaven, only One who can redeem, and His name is Jesus. There is also no biblical

“two-state solution.” Biblically, the land belongs to God’s chosen people, the Jews, and there is no changing of His mind.

In moments like these, when global spiritual leaders blur the lines of truth in the name of unity or diplomacy, believers must anchor themselves not in opinion but in the unchanging Word of God. Scripture leaves no room for an “interfaith path” to salvation. God’s Word remains the final authority, and it is the anchor by which all teachings and actions must be measured.

While the pope may seek political bridges, the Bible presents a far clearer picture: salvation comes only through Jesus, and God’s covenant with Israel stands forever. These are not negotiable truths. As we rush closer to the very end of history, Christians must stay on guard, making sure that no one deceives them, including the pope.

In this hour, Christians must remain vigilant, discerning and rooted in the Word of God, boldly proclaiming the truth even as culture shifts around us. God’s Word has not changed, and neither should our confidence in it.
