Trump also included Pepe the Frog in the background of the meme, which some outlets, such as The Independent, have criticized as a symbol of the "alt-right." The Freedom From Religion Foundation also said that "Christian nationalism is a threat to true religious freedom," in a response to the post on X.

However, the meme did not rub everyone the wrong way.

Worship leader Sean Feucht reposted the meme on X writing, "I actually kinda love that Trump posted this. He's actually starting to believe and live out that God divinely spared his life for a heavenly purpose."

Despite the backlash from some corners, President Trump's post has ignited a wave of hope among many believers who see divine purpose in his journey. For them, the message transcends politics—it speaks to the idea that no matter how dark the road may seem, God can raise up leaders for such a time as this.

The notion that God can use anyone for His purposes is a reminder that light can still shine in the darkness, and that faith, not fear, can shape the path ahead.
