

Prison Minister: Lindsay Lohan Needs Faith-Based Regeneration

Liz and Dick movie star Lindsay Lohan was offered another chance at turning her life around after she was arrested for punching a woman in a New York City nightclub and also charged on the same day with three misdemeanors in California.

Prison minister and author Marty Angelo has reached out to Lohan for a fourth time trying to convince the troubled star to enter and complete a one year faith-based residential treatment program for substance abuse problems.

Angelo has followed Lohan's various arrests since he was first contacted back in 2006 by Lohan's father, Michael who asked Angelo to reach out to help his daughter.

Angelo sent her letters and a copy of his autobiography, Once Life Matters: A New Beginning and also contacted the judge and attorneys in charge of Lohan's DUI case at that time offering to serve any jail, prison, or probation time to which she was sentenced if the former child star would enter and complete a one-year women's faith based residential treatment program. He made the same offer two other times but Lohan did not accept them.

"The wonderful thing about faith-based programs is they all have proven track records," Angelo remarked in a recent radio interview. "These programs work and have totally changed thousands of lives for decades. All boast upwards of a 86 percent success rate."

Angelo firmly believes that as soon as someone places their faith and trust in Jesus Christ, that person begins to change from the inside out because they now have Christ himself living in them.

“It is not about rehabilitation,” Angelo continues, “but Christian regeneration.”

Angelo says he hopes and prays that Lohan will take that step of faith and get serious about changing and accepting God’s true plan and purpose for her life. Angelo is again willing to serve any jail or prison time a judge will sentence her to if she agrees to his offer.
