

Prophetic Skies? Northern Lights and Cosmic Wonders Point to a Season of Spiritual Awakening

The heavens are declaring the glory of the Lord right now.

As we enter full swing into the fall season, one of the glorious ways we see God working is through the signs in the sky. According to Yahoo News' Outdoor Guide, right now we are about to embark on the peak timing of the Autumn Star, which is also known as Fomalhaut, or The Solitary One. It is reportedly one of the 20 brightest stars within the sky, and will be most visible on Friday, Oct. 3.

Just a few days following this nighttime phenomenon we will be able to see the full harvest moon on Oct. 6. Tonight, Oct. 2, there should also be the opportunity to see the Northern Lights for people living as far south as New York, according to . This wonder of the Aurora Borealis coming right as the other fantastic signs and wonders within a few days just may pose the question: what does this all mean?

Throughout this year we've seen blood moons, rare eclipses and unusual Northern Light activity. There was a blood moon eclipse this year during Purim and a solar eruption during Holy Week. It would appear as though we are being given signs of the times.

Throughout Scripture, God has often used signs in the heavens to convey His messages, warn nations, and prepare His people. From the sun standing still in Joshua's day to the prophetic significance of the moon and stars in Revelation, these heavenly displays remind us that God is actively at work in our times. Each light in the sky is a testament to His majesty and that He will be back again very soon.
