

Texas Abortion Clinic Boasts of Slaughter

One of the largest clinics in Texas rushed to complete a whopping 67 abortions in just 17 hours, ahead of implementation of the state's heartbeat bill, effectively outlawing abortion.

The pro-life law took effect Wednesday at 12 a.m. And, according to a report from the leftist news site The 19th, the Whole Woman's Health clinic in Fort Worth was teeming with patients well into Tuesday night.

Marva Sadler, the director for clinical services, "looked at the patients waiting in the lobby, at the list of patients waiting to return, at even more patients waiting outside in cars surrounded by protesters—and realized they might not get to everyone," the outlet reported.

Depicting the new law as an unmitigated assault on women's rights, the 19th described Sadler as determining the clinic needed to perform "eight abortions an hour with only one doctor on duty, an octogenarian who had been working since 7 a.m."

From the site:

Outside, chants came in through a bullhorn, protesters shouting prayer verses and arguing the clinic was too full. Already the police had been called. The fire marshal would come twice over capacity issues inside the clinic. Employees could see protesters through their security cameras and through windows of the small brick building.

They are watching us, Sadler thought, and they're winning.

Inside, she looked at her team: eight people total between the techs and the front office staff, the doctor and three staff members from a nearby clinic they brought in to help. She asked them to take a breath.

“We are not the bad guys here,” she told them. “We are doing everything right and we’re going to help everybody that we can. If there’s someone that we can’t help, it’s not our fault.”

The author of the article, Chabeli Carrazana, focused on one woman, a drug user set to begin serving a five-year prison sentence in a week. The woman, who was 12 weeks pregnant, already had three kids at home and didn’t want to deliver her fourth child while she was behind bars.

Carrazana reported the woman “dropped to her knees on the cold tile floor in front of Sadler, begging her to take her, to perform the abortion.” {eo}

For the rest of this story, please visit our content partners at .

Read articles like this one and other Spirit-led content in our new platform, CHARISMA PLUS.