

The Reconquista Begins Again? Spain Faces a New Islamic Invasion

Seventy thousand military-age men; more than three army divisions—have just stormed Spanish soil.

In a single surge, an Islamic horde poured into the Spanish enclave of Ceuta. These are not immigrants seeking a better life. They are invaders. They arrive with no intention of assimilating into Western civilization. They bring Islam, and with it the familiar scourge that has hollowed out cities across Europe.

Already the reports emerge: looting, assaults on Spanish citizens, homes broken into, streets turned into chaos. This is no accident. It is the latest chapter in a pattern repeated from England to Sweden to France to Germany—streets filled with the same demographic, mosques broadcasting calls that once echoed only in distant lands, women and children living under the shadow of violence, jihadists openly dreaming of the overthrow of Western Europe and, eventually, America.

They reproduce without restraint. Every new birth accelerates the demographic tide. Native Europeans, meanwhile, fail to replace themselves. The numbers do not lie: the host populations shrink while the newcomers expand. Elections shift. Culture erodes. Neighborhoods transform into something unrecognizable: third-world enclaves planted in the heart of the Old Continent.

Spain has seen this movie before. In the seventh century, Muslim armies crossed from North Africa and conquered the peninsula. It took centuries of struggle, the Reconquista—to reclaim it. Now the same forces return, not by sword this time, but by mass migration and the suicidal empathy of leftist leaders who open the gates and call resistance “hate.”

Europe once turned back the Mongol hordes of Genghis Khan. It once rolled back Islamic expansion. It must do so again or watch the continent become unrecognizable. The United States is next in line.

I have looked Islam in the face. It is a venomous serpent that cannot be tamed. It is incompatible with Christianity and with the values that built the West. History is not subtle: Christian Syria, Christian Jordan, Christian Arabia, Christian Egypt, Christian Libya, Christian Tunisia all fell in the seventh and eighth centuries and remain Islamic to this day. Constantinople, a Christian capital for more than a thousand years, was sacked by the Ottoman Caliphate in 1453. Only Spain, after long and bloody effort, managed to reverse the conquest. The rest never recovered.

This cannot be allowed to happen again.
