

Trump Admin Touts Promises Kept as It Reaches Dizzying 100-Day Milestone

The White House says President Trump's first 100 days have been marked by a series of wins. The president promised to lead America in a new golden age of prosperity, and he has pursued his agenda at a dizzying pace.

The president is touting results along the border as the number one accomplishment in his first 100 days. Figures indicate the once massive influx of migrants into the United States is now down to nearly zero. Border Czar Tom Homan says the president's plan is working.

He adds that more still needs to be done to stop drug cartels and terrorist gangs like Tren de Aragua and MS-13 from putting fentanyl on the streets and engaging in other criminal activity like human trafficking.

"Well, I think if you look at the border today, we've got the most secure border in the history of this nation. That's just a fact based on the data, right? President Trump was doing in seven, eight weeks what the Biden administration couldn't or wouldn't do in four years. Right? So the border's locked down at the highest level ever," Homan said.

Another promise kept deals with faith – specifically, the creation of the White House Faith Office and placing it in the West Wing. Trump also launched the Task Force on Anti-Christian Bias.

“There will be Muslims, there will be Jewish, there will be Christian, there will be Sikh, there will be people of all faiths. We are here to help people, to defend people and to protect people of faith, that their religious liberty is not taken, because the most basic right enshrined in our Constitution is we have the right to approach God and worship freely,” she said.

In foreign affairs, the president continues to work toward bringing peace to the Middle East, including talks with Iran to stop its nuclear program.
