

Trump Administration Preparing Massive New UFO File Release, Pentagon Confirms

The Trump administration is preparing to release another wave of UFO-related files, with Pentagon officials confirming that new materials tied to unidentified anomalous phenomena, or UAPs, are currently being processed for public release.

The announcement comes just weeks after the administration's first disclosure on May 8, which included previously unseen videos, photographs and government documents connected to unexplained aerial encounters involving military personnel and NASA missions.

Chief Pentagon spokesperson Sean Parnell announced Monday on X that the next batch of files is "actively being processed" and expected to be released "very soon."

The latest development has intensified public fascination surrounding UFO disclosure as lawmakers continue pressuring federal agencies to release additional classified material that many believe has remained hidden from the public for decades.

Among the most vocal advocates for transparency has been Tim Burchett, a Republican congressman who has repeatedly pushed for the declassification of UAP records. Burchett suggested the first release was only the beginning.

"The 1st drop will be big, but in comparison to what is coming, they will be a drop in the bucket," Burchett said following the initial disclosure.

Burchett later alleged that resistance inside Washington may still be slowing the release of information.

"The problem we have right now is that the Deep State's fighting a president on release. And he kept his word," Burchett told Morell Media. "I suspect some of our not-so-friendly comrades in some alphabet agencies are slow-walking a lot of information. It's about power, it's about control. That's kind of what runs Washington."

The renewed attention surrounding the disclosures exploded online after Donald Trump shared an AI-generated image depicting himself alongside a handcuffed alien figure at a military base, fueling another round of debate over what the government may or may not know about unexplained aerial phenomena.

The administration's first release included several pieces of footage and imagery that quickly spread across social media, including infrared military video from 2013 showing a glowing object moving erratically through the night sky. Additional materials reportedly included photographs connected to NASA's Apollo 12 and Apollo 17 missions, FBI images from 1999 appearing to show unidentified objects near military aircraft and photographs allegedly captured by military pilots showing fast-moving objects near planes mid-flight.

At the center of the disclosure effort is Anna Paulina Luna, chair of the House Oversight Task Force on Declassification. Luna has repeatedly stated that additional military UAP footage remains hidden from the public and previously requested the release of 46 classified videos.

Officials have not confirmed what the next release will contain, leaving speculation swirling over whether additional videos, radar data, pilot testimony or intelligence assessments may soon emerge.

Even as interest surrounding UFOs continues growing worldwide, we must approach every claim carefully and biblically. Scripture repeatedly warns us not to be carried away by fear, deception or sensationalism, but instead to test all things against the truth of God's Word.

While many questions remain unanswered about the government's disclosures, we are called to remain grounded in Scripture rather than speculation. As more information is released in the weeks ahead, the growing fascination surrounding UFOs will likely continue raising profound questions about truth, deception and humanity's search for answers beyond this world.
