

Trumpets Sound on Temple Mount for the First Time in 2,000 Years

Events in Israel, and more specifically Jerusalem, continue to point to God's prophetic clock and the timeline for the end times continues to grow closer.

Perhaps one day soon we may even see the nation unite and move toward the restoration of the Temple.

But that is arguably a long ways away, since the Temple Mount itself is still in dispute, yet events such as the sounding of the silver temple trumpets, which took place on Tisha B'Av, the day of remembrance of the destruction of both the First and Second Temples, took place recently.

Israel365 reports that a man, Josh Wander, created and brought with him to the Machkama building two silver trumpets meant for the temple, and blew them, technically, on the Temple Mount.

The space where his group sounded the trumpets was not on the floor of the Temple Mount per se, but the building they were in actually projects out over the Temple Mount. It is about as close as they can get, in a secluded space away from prying eyes who would seek to stop them, without starting a potential war in the holy city.

As reported by Israel365, "The trumpets were blown at a prayer service held twice a year and overseen by Rabbi Rami Goren, the son of Rabbi Shlomo Goren, who served as the first head of the military rabbinate of the Israel Defense Forces. Rabbi Shlomo Goren oversaw the IDF victory in the 1967 Six-Day War that brought the Temple Mount under Israeli sovereignty."

The Temple Mount has been under increased scrutiny the world over ever since the Hamas terrorist attack on Oct. 7, 2023.

Compound the heightened tension level in the region with the arrival of several red heifers, a necessary component for the ritual purification of Jewish priests, and it looks like preparations are well under way for the eventual return of the Temple to Jerusalem.
