

Virginia Parents Fight to Recall School Board Over Leftist Indoctrination

In Loudoun County, concerned parents believe public school board members are censoring free speech and discriminating against students based on race.

Tuesday night brought the latest in a series of showdowns between outraged parents and a school board that they believe is indoctrinating children with leftist ideology.

Loudoun County Public Schools are now seen as ground zero for the public controversies that are roiling parents nationwide. Voices here are among the loudest with a growing number of parents insisting the system is indoctrinating children with an anti-American agenda.

About an hour west of Washington, D.C., the area is famous for rolling hills, wineries and staggering population growth over the last couple decades.

These days, however, it's getting headlines for explosive school board meetings, which now include irate parents reading X-rated book excerpts from the required high school grade reading list.
