This year, Pennsylvania state legislators Stephanie Borowicz and Doug Mastriano spearheaded a move that now declares September 12th the “Day of the Bible” in Pennsylvania.

“I can’t think of anything more important than to put and restore the Bible back before (America’s) 250th anniversary,” State Rep. Borowicz told us.

The move is now gaining steam with a resolution introduced in Congress to recognize the day nationwide. Mastriano believes change is in the air.

He said, “We are that rock that dropped into the lake, and I believe we’re taking this land back.”

Last month, that effort began with a celebration in Philadelphia, held within Independence Square at a key location.

It really makes sense that the Bible would be celebrated in a place like this, inside Congress Hall. This place is historic—the first Congress ever in United States history met here for 10 years, from 1790 to 1800. Some of the original founders literally sat right here in these exact seats. And of course, the Bible was at the center of it all.
