

Winner of 'The Voice' Praises 'Lord Above' After Miraculous Survival From Gunshot Wound

Jason "Sundance" Head, winner of season 11 of NBC's "The Voice," is praising God after surviving an accidental gunshot wound to the stomach.

The 46-year-old singer was out in the woods by himself for a solo camping trip on Nov. 15, when the bullet pierced his stomach, barely missing his vital organs, his agent told USA Today.

In a video posted to his Facebook account, Head—the son of rockabilly singer Roy Head—recounted the harrowing incident, explaining he always travels with a .22-caliber revolver, one that "looks just like the kind of gun you'd see in a Western movie." He said he keeps the gun in a quick-draw holster.

"I really don't know what happened still," he recalled, remembering putting on his backpack with the holster sitting in the passenger seat. Head said he was shot as he turned and began walking away.

"It happened that fast," he added. "That revolver slid out of the case and it hit the doorjamb on the Jeep on the floor step and it shot me."

After realizing he was hurt, Head said he reached into the pocket of his jeans to pull out his phone, realizing his pockets "were already full of blood." It was then the singer-songwriter knew he needed medical attention.

The entertainer's wife, Misty, quickly took to social media to urge "prayer warriors" to pray for her husband, who was taken by medevac to the hospital at University of Texas at Tyler, where the trauma team began swiftly working to save Head.

Ultimately, Head credited the "good Lord above" and the "wonderful first responders" as well as the care specialists at the hospital for saving his life.

"I was sure I was going to die," he said. "It was one of the craziest things that ever happened to me."
