

Jonathan Cahn Exposes the Disturbing Antisemitism of Tucker Carlson and Nick Fuentes

Tucker Carlson has crossed a line, and it's more than troubling—it's dangerous.

As Jonathan Cahn described in his latest prophetic message, Carlson recently hosted Nick Fuentes on his show, who is a self-proclaimed admirer of Hitler and virulent hater of Jews. By putting Fuentes on his show, Carlson has taken fringe extremism and brought it into millions of living rooms, normalizing an ideology rooted in hatred.

Fuentes openly praises Hitler, and criticizes Israel. Carlson, while cloaking this as curiosity or debate, knows the effect this platform has. Ratings may rise, but the cost is the spread of a toxic worldview—a worldview that history shows leads to devastation. As Cahn points out, in the 1920s, Adolf Hitler was dismissed as a fringe figure, yet public exposure allowed his ideology to move into the mainstream, culminating in a holocaust and a world war. Carlson's actions mirror the early stages of that dangerous trajectory.

What is most profound about the widespread antisemitism that Carlson and Fuentes are spreading is that on a grander scale this is not merely a political issue—it is spiritual and cultural. America's "immune system" against hate is weakening. Hatred of Israel and the Jewish people, once largely confined to the radical left, is now appearing on the right. Christian Zionists—those who love Israel and follow the Bible's call to "pray for the peace of Jerusalem"—are suddenly being labeled extremists. Carlson himself has claimed that Christians who support Israel have a "brain virus," saying he "dislikes them more than anybody else."

The spiritual stakes are high. The Bible warns that those who curse Israel will be cursed, while those who bless the Jewish people will be blessed. As Cahn notes, "Everything you read about the Christian faith...was written by a Jewish person who loved Israel and was attached to the nation of Israel." Without the Jewish people, the foundation of Christianity itself would not exist.
