

Kim Clement: Millions Are About to Experience a 'Suddenly' Moment

There are seasons when nothing appears to be moving.

You've prayed. You've waited. You've remained faithful. You've plowed the same ground over and over again, wondering when the promise will finally become reality.

But what if the waiting season is actually positioning you for a suddenly?

In a resurfaced prophetic message shared through the Kim Clement Prophetic Rewind, the late prophet delivered a striking word about the moments when God radically shifts circumstances—sometimes after years of preparation.

"Don't you tell me that He doesn't do things suddenly," Clement said. "See, the fact is, He's spoken it years ago. And then it takes place so quickly."

The biblical pattern was unmistakable: Long periods of preparation often preceded dramatic moments of divine intervention.

"When you're in the right place, the right time, for the right reason, at the right season, you're aligned yourself with suddenly," he said.

Clement then delivered what he said was a word from the Lord concerning people who had spent years faithfully plowing.

“He said there are literally millions of people that are about to have a suddenly moment,” Clement said. “You’ve been plowing in a field for a long, long time, and now your plowing is coming to an end.”

His message echoes throughout Scripture.

Joseph endured betrayal, slavery and imprisonment before his circumstances changed almost overnight. Clement reminded believers that Joseph “woke up a prisoner” before suddenly becoming a prime minister.

“Don’t you give up now,” Clement urged. “Pastor, don’t you give up now.”

Clement also pointed to Moses, David, Daniel and Saul as examples of people whose lives encountered sudden divine turning points. Moses spent decades shepherding before encountering the burning bush. David was delivering bread before confronting Goliath. Daniel prayed and fasted for 21 days before an angel appeared.

Then there was Pentecost.

The disciples waited in the upper room until, as Acts 2 records, the Holy Spirit suddenly filled the house.

“Don’t tell me there’s no such thing as suddenly,” Clement declared.

Yet Clement’s message wasn’t simply about waiting passively for circumstances to change. He emphasized spiritual movement and preparation.

He pointed to 2 Kings 3, when Elisha instructed the people to dig ditches despite there being no visible sign of rain. They prepared for water before they could see where it would come from.

That is faith: preparing for what God has spoken even when circumstances appear to contradict the promise.

“Suddenly is about to appear, people,” Clement said. “It comes during certain decades at certain times, and so my message to you is it’s one of those times.”

Perhaps most strikingly, Clement argued that the darkest circumstances can become the backdrop for the greatest reversal.

“See, it looks so bad, it looks so difficult that we don’t realize you’re set up for a suddenly,” he said.

The message is simple: Don’t mistake God’s silence for His absence.

The field you’ve been plowing may be nearing harvest. The prayers you’ve been praying have not disappeared. And the season that seemed as though it would never end can change faster than you ever imagined.

As Clement repeatedly urged the crowd: Don’t stop waiting.

Your suddenly may be closer than it appears.
