

Perry Stone: This Year's Most Important Message

In a special message with Karen Wheaton, Perry Stone discussed the spiritual battle currently raging in our nation today, and how God is desiring to use His church.

"We don't need to be moved by the natural things that we're seeing happening right now because the things that's happening in America sort of disguises itself as a political war or a cultural this is a spiritual war," Wheaton says.

Pondering about the spiritual state of our nation and the slaughtering of innocent blood through abortion, Wheaton asked God if judgment for our nation was inevitable.

"He answered me with three words that I heard; He said, 'Who knows? Perhaps,'" says Wheaton.

God then led Wheaton to look at the Scripture in Joel 2, where verse 14 reads, "Who knows? Perhaps he will give you a reprieve, sending you a blessing instead of this curse."

She then points out that this Scripture lends us to believe that judgment and blessing for our nation is still in the balance, dependent upon how God's people respond.

Stone says that we often see people less inclined to care about who's in charge, believing it doesn't matter exactly who is running in the nation. However, this is not how we as God's people are to act.

“What we have to remember is when Daniel was in Babylonian captivity, he was praying for Israel. He was repenting to God on behalf of the ministry of the priest,” Stone says. “He was saying, ‘Our judges have passed laws that’s contrary to You [God], our priests have not been faithful to You.’”

Wheaton notes that the phrasing of “Who knows? Perhaps,” is also found in Jonah in the New Living Translation as well.
