

Update: What to Know About the Red Heifer Ceremony

In an exclusive interview with Charisma Media, Byron Stinson gave an update on the red heifer ceremony, and what we need to be on the lookout for next.

Stinson had the privilege of bringing five red heifers from Texas to Jerusalem in hopes that the prophetic ceremony would soon take place, in preparation for the ushering in of the Third Temple.

“In Numbers 19, there’s a law that says you are to bring this red cow, and the red cow is the offering or ceremony of purification. And what you do is you take the ashes of this cow and you mix it with the living water from the Gihon Spring and it brings purification, physically away from death,” Stinson explains. “Everyone’s suffering under death. Anything you can see, touch, smell, anything, it’s death.”

Stinson points out that Christians have had our sins atoned for by the blood of Christ, and the hope now is that, at the end times, we will see even more of the physical manifestations of God bringing His kingdom to earth.

“There’s a time that comes this physical manifestation that we can actually see, and that’s part of the process of bringing eternal life, [the] return to the Garden of Eden,” Stinson says.

Stinson says that originally they imported five of the red heifers to Israel, and kept them near Gilgal before moving them to Shiloh, having the cows follow the same footsteps as the Tabernacle did in the Old Testament.

“All five of them are there. Two have grown some white or black hairs, and so they’re no longer good for the ceremony, but they’re excellent for breeding,” Stinson says. “So, there’s two of them that have been bred back and there’s still three that are pure [and] could be used for the ceremony.”
