

Ancient Giants in Jerusalem? Archaeologists Uncover Startling Proof

If you've ever wondered whether biblical giants were real, Perry Stone's latest video might give you something to think about.

Reporting from the Pool of Siloam, an ancient site in Jerusalem where Jesus healed a blind man (John 9), Stone explores stunning new archaeological discoveries—including a 3,700-year-old wall so massive that it raises serious questions about how it was built.

"This was built in the Canaanite time," Stone explains, standing before a 26-foot-high wall unearthed in the City of David excavation site. But it's not just the height that's impressive—it's the sheer size of the stones used to construct it. "There were stones on that wall that were so big... how did they engineer this? How did they move this here?"

This isn't just an architectural mystery—it's a biblical one. Stone connects the massive structures to the Rephaim, a term used in Scripture to describe a race of giants. "The Valley of the Rephaim is on the west side of Jerusalem... and Rephaim is a Hebrew word for giants," he points out.

The Bible often speaks of giant clans in ancient Canaan, including the Anakim, Zamzummim and Nephilim (Deut. 2:10-11; Gen. 6:4).
