Daniel Never Protested Babylon

Daniel got dragged out of his homeland, renamed after a pagan god, and dropped into the capital of the empire that destroyed everything he loved.

He never led a protest.

Read the book again. No marches. No boycotts. No long speeches about how corrupt Babylon was. Everybody already knew Babylon was Babylon.

What did he do instead? He got so good at his work that four kings couldn't run the place without him.

Daniel 6:3: "Daniel distinguished himself above the governors and satraps, because an excellent spirit was in him."

They went looking for dirt to take him down. They couldn't find any. The man had no scandal because the man had no slack.

There's a posture for hard cultural moments, and most believers pick the wrong one. They cower, or they shout. Daniel did neither. He built. He out-thought, out-served, and out-worked the system until the system had to make room for his God.

You are not called to win the argument about the culture. You're called to become undeniable inside it.

Be the one they can't replace.
