After hours of exploring a cave in the Middle East with few findings, Justin Kessler's alarm sounded. He and his lifelong best friend, 10-year-old Michael Gomez, had joined Michael's father, a university professor, for a summer archaeological dig at the Dead Sea.

And now came the annoying reminder: Dr. Gomez expected them for dinner.

Something caught young Gomez's eye, but not before a nasty fall face-first into the wall of the cave. There, the duo found a pair of 2,000-year-old dehydrated squirrels—a discovery that would change their lives forever.
