Cahn identifies what he calls “ancient keys” to recognizing demonic possession, drawing parallels from biblical accounts. These include isolation, an attraction to death, violent behavior, irrationality, self-destructive tendencies and a dual relationship with the divine. Demonic influence, he explains, often manifests as both an avoidance and a perverse engagement with holiness. “On one hand, they avoid the things of God,” Cahn said, “but on the other hand, they’re drawn to the things of God to hinder the things of God, harass the things of God or desecrate the things of God.”

Applying these principles to the shooter, Cahn notes that he was a loner, fascinated with acts of violence and obsessed with bringing terror to others. His behavior was self-destructive, as he planned to end his own life in the process, and he specifically targeted a church school during prayer, showing a perverse engagement with the sacred. “By shooting the children, he's shooting Jesus. He's literally at war with God," Cahn emphasized, highlighting the spiritual dimension of the violence.
