"The first one was up in the mountains," she says, "And I was not a believer. At that time, I was walking in sin. I was a drug addict, and I thought to myself, '[you've] totally lost it.'"

Later, Souza came into a conversation with a woman who lived on the property where she spotted the werewolf. It turned out that this woman had left a coven of witches, and the werewolf was there for her, but Souza had interfered. Souza also found out that she had interacted with the man who was a werewolf and his wife, a witch, who had tried to recruit Souza into the coven.

Souza had visited the seemingly normal couple's home, and it was there that she discovered some very peculiar things.

"When she took me down to the basement, all that was down there was a water tank, a shelf that had a piece of velvet on it and a noose hanging from a beam," Souza says.

In the basement, Souza recounts seeing the noose and that: "If anybody were to hang, their feet wouldn't touch the ground, and then a hole was full of dry blood."

She also says the wife told her something terrifying about this strange basement setup.

"That's why you could be down here and scream your head off, and nobody [would] ever hear you," Souza recounts from the chilling conversation.

Souza remembers inquisitively asking about the strange basement, but received unusual responses from the wife. She says the couple also had giant barrels of alcohol in the house, something that the couple also could not answer questions about. Even though she herself was not a Christian, Souza knew something was not right as the pair claimed that they were Christians. She knew the things she saw in the house didn't line up with Christian living. She headed swiftly out of the house, finding the couple's oddities dark and peculiar.
