

Coronavirus, China, and Cryptocurrencies

Getting straight to the point, these three things directly relate to end-times prophecy and are interconnected in ways that, at first glance, seemingly make no sense. In a nutshell, coronavirus is an indicator of judgments to come; China is a prominent nation in end-times prophecy; and cryptocurrencies are digital money that may provide a means for the antichrist to control the world's economy. Let's unravel this.

Coronavirus is a harbinger of future judgments on humanity as, for example, will be the case with the "pestilence" that torments the Russians and their Islamic allies in Ezekiel 38:22 and the "pestilences" in various places of Matthew 24:7 and Luke 21:11. Pestilence is just another word for communicable diseases, and we are rife with them now: coronavirus and SARS, methicillin resistant staphylococcus aureus (MRSA), tuberculosis, malaria (the biggest of them all), AIDS, STDs in general, H1N1, and now measles again, to name only a few. There is even recent news that the bubonic plague has cropped up in China, i.e., Mongolia to be specific. An interesting little factoid about these diseases is that China seems to have a propensity for being the initiation point for some of them. This brings me to the topic of China and connecting the prophetical implications of coronavirus to this nation that is prominent in end-times prophecy.

I have subscriptions to various financial planning news services. One of them within the last week published an article about the more sinister and real reason that China is "quarantining" paper currency from its marketplace under the guise of protecting the public from coronavirus: the war on cash. The financial insiders that I track have been saying for years that governments around the world are itching to get rid of paper cash and metal coinage because of the lack of control they have over paper and coinage. Governments despise the inability to easily track cash-based transactions, because they can't take or tax what they can't see, and they can't track illegal activities such as drug smuggling or human trafficking where paper cash is used (if they even care about those filthy activities, since some governments actually participate in them). As human history has nearly perfectly shown, all governments eventually seek to control their citizens and eventually will oppress them. For that reason, any individual who calls for more government involvement in our lives is at least one of three things: (1) ignorant, meaning they don't have the facts to come to a logical conclusion, (2) brutish/stupid (Proverbs 12:1 KJV/NKJV), meaning they have the facts but don't have the intellectual horsepower to come to a logical conclusion or don't care to do so, or (3) wicked, meaning they have the facts, know what the facts mean, but deliberately choose evil for their own perverse purposes. Alright, sorry, I got sidetracked a bit there on that last part, but I needed to blow off some steam that has arisen from watching certain political factions in this country systematically tear US apart.
