

New Christian Mobile Network Aims to Create Safer Internet for Families

A new Christian mobile phone provider is launching with a mission to create a safer digital environment for families and believers navigating an increasingly explicit online culture.

Radiant Mobile says it will offer wireless service combined with network-level filtering designed to block pornography and other harmful online content. The company officially launched this week and operates as a mobile virtual network operator through T-Mobile's infrastructure.

Radiant Mobile founder Paul Fisher told MIT Technology Review the company wants to build "an environment that is Jesus-centric." The filtering system is designed to block pornography by default while also allowing parents and users to customize additional protections on devices.

"We've got to figure out some way to close the door to the digital space," Chief Operating Officer Chris Klimis said regarding concerns about pornography exposure and online dangers facing children and families.

According to reports, the service uses technology from Israeli cybersecurity company Allot to categorize online content and apply filters directly through the wireless network itself.

The company also plans to include Christian-based content for subscribers, including devotionals, Bible-focused videos and family-friendly material. Fisher said part of the company's monthly subscription model could eventually support participating churches.

Radiant Mobile joins a growing movement of faith-based technology alternatives aimed at helping Christians engage the digital world while maintaining biblical values and stronger protections for families.
